.bin mdadm --zero-superblock /dev/sdb mdadm --assemble --run /dev/sdb mdadm --assemble --add /dev/sdb /dev/sda # killall -i ufw I've got the flash drive now plugged back in on my wifi network and am ready to reload the firmware. A few moments later, I'm prompted to reboot. With the device already on, I've loaded the firmware onto the Nexus 9 and then disconnected the wifi network. The backup tool states that the restore is complete, and once I power off the device and plug it back in, I'm at my last boot status of the N9. The OS X backup tool on my MacBook Air is one of my favorites because it is quick, easy to use, and will allow me to backup or restore OS X when I don't have the device in my possession. However, I found that my OS X backup didn't save to my mounted USB drive. The mount point on the drive was created to look for the backup file, but the file wasn't present. In fact, the file was missing on the whole device. However, the file was there at the root of the drive when I ejected it. When I attempted to re-do the backup, I found that the file wasn't present anymore. When the file was missing, I was able to find it after doing a search in Disk Utility. You can also use the Terminal command `df -h` to list all of the files and folders, and you can also use the `rm` command to remove any file or folder. In conclusion, I haven't had a problem using the OS X backup tool, but I recommend using the backup software from your mobile device instead of relying on the Mac backup utility.
