The interest in graphene and graphene-based materials has grown in recent years. In addition, methods for the production of large quantities of graphene and graphene-based materials at relatively low cost are desired. Numerous methods are known to date in the production of graphene. However, most of these methods have limitations that make the resulting graphene materials unsuitable for certain applications. For example, conventional methods for producing graphene from natural graphite or synthetic graphite include removal of the oxide layers using concentrated nitric acid or other acids, and ultrasonication of graphite that has been exfoliated to make individual graphene sheets. However, these types of processes have limitations, such as by-products that make them non-compatible with integration in electronic devices. Furthermore, they are limited by the fact that it is difficult to produce uniform graphene samples and consequently have a broad distribution of grain sizes. Additionally, the methods of production have a low yield of only approximately 20%. The use of chemical gas phase reactions, such as plasma-assisted CVD, has also been attempted. However, these methods have a low yield of approximately 10%. Novel methods that use water as a reaction medium are believed to be compatible with integration in electronic devices, especially because they result in relatively defect-free graphene. Unfortunately, they are currently very slow and/or time-consuming. In particular, methods including solution-phase exfoliation methods of thermal exfoliation are not commercially viable due to their large reaction times, large amounts of residual hydrochloric acid, and low yields. Furthermore, current exfoliation methods result in high defect-density graphene. Conventional microwave processing of graphite-based materials can be used to produce nanocarbons, as disclosed in, for example, U.S. Pat. No. 5

Monday, 23 April 2011 Writing about Auckland in the context of 2011 Nearly 40 years ago, in 1974, Ernest J. Cline wrote a book with the subtitle "An Illustrated History of Auckland." Published by the Horwood Printing Company, which in those days was part of the Auckland University Press, it contained 658 pages of text, 53 of which were illustrations. Ernest Cline's book, illustrated (c) Auckland University Press Much has happened in the intervening period and, besides the introduction of text in the book, I have gone through the entire manuscript, converting the illustrations, drawings and photographs to modern black and white, arranging them, making my corrections, renumbering the maps, and simplifying the text. I have changed too. I am sure, the feel of the book, so I am not sure now whether it would be entirely accurate to call it "an illustrated history". But it is still a most enjoyable volume to flip through, indeed a very good present for a friend. All the more enjoyable if you live in Auckland. It is easy to see the problems that Auckland faces in 2011, as the Cline book did in 1974. The city is somewhat more than twice the size it was then, and many of its problems are now more prevalent than they were then. So it is not surprising that, not surprisingly, the Cline book talks about some of those problems. But the book at least does so in a rather light-hearted manner that is reminiscent of the way that the writer himself became a very successful barrister and then, after that, into radio journalism. The book is divided into three parts: The city in prehistory; The city in pre-European times; The city in European times. I don't have the CI 50b96ab0b6
