The prevalence of comorbid illnesses in patients with bipolar I disorder. In this study, the author examined the prevalence of substance abuse and dependence and medical illnesses in a large sample of patients with bipolar I disorder to determine whether comorbid conditions can be identified. A total of 1,822 patients with bipolar I disorder, who were consecutively admitted to a research facility, were assessed.

The prevalence of medical illnesses (e.g., hypertension, obesity, diabetes mellitus, and hypothyroidism), substance abuse/dependence (e.g., alcohol abuse, polysubstance abuse or dependence, and dependence on only one substance), and psychopathology were examined. The author found that medical illnesses were present in almost one-fifth of the sample. Alcohol abuse was the most frequent diagnosis (7.8%), and the presence of substance abuse disorders in individuals with bipolar disorder was associated with more frequent medical illnesses. The associations between substance abuse and the presence of medical illness and medical illness and the presence of substance abuse were present in both men and women, whereas the associations between substance dependence and the presence of medical illness, medical illness and the presence of substance dependence were not significant. In conclusion, the results of this study are consistent with past research suggesting that the comorbidity of medical illness and substance abuse is higher in patients with
